Crusty Carlyle. The Rev. Mr. Blunt, the venerable rector of Chelsea, who has just retired after a service of forty-five years, said the other day, "Carlyle had the key of my garden, and he used it." He also visited the old rectory, which stands in Church street, where he "would sit after dinner, pipe in mouth, and his reflections would flow in a brilliant and incessant stream. But when he began to abuse anybody or anything it was no use trying to stop him. In particular he hated Huxley's writings and detested all science. I remember Huxley, sweeter as years drew on, telling me that it was no use contradicting him. He was so great and so old. In fact, Carlyle was a peasant to the end. Carlyle did not often go to church, but somebody once took him to see Westminster abbey. He was impressed with the building, but not with the service, 'and as for being buried in it,' he growl-

Church Companionship. The young man who abandons the church voluntarily cuts himself off from the most exalted thoughts that can enter the human heart. He puts himself out of the company of Raphael and Rubens and Thorwaldsen when he might live in the atmosphere that made them great. If Michael Angelo and Bir Christopher Wren and Inigo Jones welcome him at the door, Mendelssohn and Bee- lenses cutting out the red rays will but cannot be sold so cheaply and, thoven and Bach greet him as he enters. The organ may be spavined and windgalled, the choir may be an aggregation of tuneless tyros, but if the young man has brought any worshipful music in his soul into the church the same uplifting sentiments that inspired the "Messiah" and "Elijah" will sweep the chords of his heart as the organist touches the keys or as the choir clears its collective throat and sings "Old Hundred."-Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D., in Ladies' Home Journal.

The Guinen Pig. The guinea pig is an absurd little animal for a number of reasons, and one of the most remarkable absurdities about him is his name. He is not a pig of any kind or any relation to the pig, and he has nothing to do with Guinea. He is a kind of rat, and his can quench man's ambition to fly or money by which they personally are native home is South America.

I thought of this remark many times last year while I was living in the Thoreau house, for while there I had access to the diaries of volumes, the thoughts of forty years, and in which he mentions many times the "sweet singer of Concord." There is hardly an American name which has furnished so much literary and personcott, and yet in those journals there is much interesting matter still unexploit he was generously endowed with the giving out quality. In his poetle spirit his daughter Louisa and Thoreau and Emerson, too, found inspiration. The kindergarten system, introduced in America by that lovely woman Elizabeth Peabody, was tested by Alcott in the training of his own children, and in his journals he speaks of talking over these things with Elizabeth, illustrating the doctrine by saying that Louisa at the age of six distinguishes the difference between "body thoughts and spirit thoughts." He asserts, too. that she loves figures of speech and allegory and that both she and Anna are "so immaterial in their natures as find ideas more satisfying than reali
